

10 Tips for Finding Out What You Need to Know

- 1.) Libraries are wonderful resources - librarians are even better.
- 2.) Books - check the index, rather than the table of contents. Especially explore the bibliography. Keep digging back to primary sources.
- 3.) Internet is a great starting place - but a terrible ending place.
- 4.) There is an association for everything. Use them as a source.
- 5.) Public affairs/information/media office often last resort & slow answer.
- 6.) Go as high as you can. Start there. Avoid the phone trees.

Points on talking to people:

- most like to answer questions about what they do/know
- but ask to set up convenient time for them
- have a few questions ready, but also let their answers lead you to more questions

- ask what the books/movies/stereotypes, etc. get wrong about them.
- ask if you haven't asked something you should have.
- ask what they can tell you about their area of expertise that most people don't know or would be surprised about.

7.) Straight lines are often the fastest route to nowhere
- Instead, zig-zag.

8.) Think connections.

9.) Avoid dead ends by asking all sources their ideas of whom else to talk to.

10.) Have more than one line of inquiry going.
